THE BLUE GROTTO AT CAPRI.

The manner of entering this grotto in the towing cockle-shells is rather novel, as the opening is a small hole, more like a fissure, and every one has to lie flat and patiently wait till a receding wave makes the narrow mouth larger; then, with a strong push and harsh grating, the boat glides through, and swims noiselessly in the little pool within.

The size of the chamber, according to a French observer, measures about one hundred and fifty by one hundred feet. The height of the ceiling from the water is forty feet, while the depth below is fifty feet, thus making a symmetrical room, notwithstanding the deep recesses and pulpit-like projections and vaulted roof, which give to it all that grotesque style of architecture made so weird and fantastic in the strange coloring.

The sensation as you float about is described as very peculiar, and for a moment or two one is completely lost in the dreamy-line surroundings; for everywhere, on the walls, in the water, and on the objects within, is that remarkable greenish-blue tint, which Dr. Peabody compares to a "lambent sheet of blue flame," but which reminds many most vividly of the vapory flame that arises from burning spirits, and some find it difficult to rid their senses of the idea that the whole place is in flames. Queer as the walls look, human faces are almost horrible in their ghastly hues; and the boatmen, who sometimes swim around in the forbidding waves, have the appearance of some frightful creatures, half-fish and half-man, as they frolic about, their arms and backs gleaming with silvery scales.

Of course, the first question which arises in the visitor's mind is, "What makes the singular reflection?" The entrance to the grotto is through a small cavern, scarcely four feet high; so small, in fact, that it is impossible to enter when the sea is the least rough, and there are many instances where parties have been imprisoned in the chamber for hours, owing to a sudden rise of the waves. From this circumstance it can readily be seen how very small the mouth of the grotto is, when a minute may bring a state of things which will completely close it. The reflection of these colors must be due to the light received through the opening at the mouth, for there is no other as yet discovered, and this makes the grotto a thing of wonder as well as of beauty.

Like every place in that land of song, fair Italy, the Grotto Azzurra has its legends and history, which can be quickly told. It was well known in the days of antiquity, and they show one even now, a flight of stone steps leading from the pool high up in the darkness above, which is said to have been used by Tiberius—at least, the steps led to the open air in those days, though now the passage is closed, and the stairs have probably never been used since the time of the celebrated old emperor, who found in this sweet island in the sea a stronger fascination than in statecraft in the strange coloring.

It really seems strange that, notwithstanding the knowledge the ancients possessed of this queer grotto, it should have died with them, and no legend of its existence remained; but such was the case, for it was not re-discovered until about 1822—how, we have not learned. But if the discoverer could only claim royalty on those who visit it, he would be a very rich man; for during the season—and the season at Capri lasts a long time—a great number of strangers go there every day.

In a little more than an hour the steamer brings its passengers from Sorrento alongside the lofty slopes of Capri, and the numerous small row-boats there at once indicate to the tourist that he is in the immediate vicinity of the far-famed Blue Grotto.—Phila. Sat. Night.

WASHINGTON'S FIGURE IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

Individuals of many nations have tombs or monuments there to their memory. One of these monuments is that of Count de Montpensier, brother of Louis Phillipe, late king of the French, while the only memorial there of Washington is a small bas-relief figure of him, in the group of American officers to be seen on the carving on the tablet erected in honor of Major Andre, where Washington is represented as about to receive a flag of truce sent by the British commander, with a view, if possible, of saving the life of the unfortunate prisoner, who is represented sitting dejected in the background—the figures of a lady and children, weeping, forming a part of the British group.

This monument usually elicits the special attention of Americans, and believing the inscription upon it will be of interest to the general reader, we here insert an exact copy:

"Sacred to the memory of Major John Andre, who, raised by his merit at an early period of life to the rank of adjutant-general of the British forces in America, and employed in an important but hazardous enterprise, fell a sacrifice to his zeal for his king and country on the 2d of October, A. D. 1780, aged twenty-nine; universally beloved and esteemed by the army in which he served, and lamented even by his foes. His gracious Majesty King George III. has caused this monument to be erected."

At the base there is an inscription to the effect that on the 28th of November, 1821, his Royal Highness the Duke of York caused the remains of Major Andre to be removed from Tappan, and deposited in a grave contiguous to the monument.

Another inscription from the base of two marble statues, full size, in officer's uniform, also elicits the special notice of Americans:

"Major-General Sir Edward Pakenham and General Samuel Gibbs, who fell gloriously on the 8th of January, 1815, while leading the troops to an attack on the enemy's works in front of New Orleans."

THE LEANING TOWER OF PISA.

A correspondent, writing of the leaning Tower of Pisa, says that, whether by accident or design, no one can now tell, the inclination of the structure makes it look and feel to the visitor as if it were about to fall. It is 180 feet high and is 13 feet out of the perpendicular. This is stated everywhere, and is no doubt true, but I suppose there are many persons who, like myself, expected to see a building standing erect, the centre of whose top was outside the centre of gravity.

This is not the case by any means. It is true that a rope falling from the centre of the top would strike the wall at the bottom of the tower side, but the rope would not fall outside the tower wall. In a short time I satisfied myself and two other visitors of this fact. The apparent contradiction of the laws of nature disappears, then, in a moment.

Taking the building as a whole—letting a line fall from the centre to the top—if this line fell outside of the base, in that case the building would violate the law of gravity if it remained standing. I believe the architect planned this optical delusion. There are no signs of any giving way in the structure. No crack or crevice gives evidence of rapid or slow settling of the walls.

The architect knew very well how easily the eye can be deceived. The firmness of the masonry, the gradual ascent, the symmetry of the whole, prove beyond a doubt that it was built as it now stands. The walls below are very thick, and unless these should give way there is but one other method by which the building could be overthrown. If the stones were to slip from their places, then, little by little, it would be dislodged. But the whole structure is keyed and bolted and cemented into a solid mass. If it leaned nine feet more than it does, then it would fall, because the sum of its weight would fall outside of the center of gravity. The mystery disappears at once when we examine it, but the curious effect upon one's nerves in making the ascent and standing on the top is nevertheless real.

AN ELEPHANT'S FAVORITES.

Elephants are very fond of babies and dogs. A keeper in a certain menagerie now in this country trusts his little son, who is not quite two years old, with the huge animals, knowing that they will not harm the child. The little toddler is fondled and caressed by the huge, clumsy creatures, who wind their trunks around them in a most affectionate manner. A pet dog that belonged to the same menagerie was recently run over by a wagon and killed. The dog had been the particular pet of one of the elephants, named Queen. She mused the dog, and gave signs of great distress. She kept looking round and round, and, when night came, she was very unhappy. A dog that looked something like "Spot" was taken to "Queen," but she refused to have anything to do with the new pet. It was several days before "Queen" could get over her grief.

Acting with specific energy on the kidneys and liver, it cures the worst diseases caused by their derangement. Use it at once.

He was a nice and a very new young man, and his employer took kindly to him on the first day in the factory, asking him to help in "checking off" and "calling back" the sizes of certain goods. All went well until the youth, in finishing up a string of numbers, called out: "Fifty-five, eleven, forty-fo'—keno!" A great solemn hush fell over the rest of the clerks as the old man called the blushing lad up to the desk and desired an explanation; and the misguided youth put his foot in deeper by stammering out that it was only the "force of habit" made him say it. The old gentleman eyed him calmly for a moment, and then, laying down seventy-five cents for his day's wages, said: "Boy, 'rake the pot,' and go and renounce your sins."—Detroit Free Press.
